Illustration: Sam WoolleySharks Don't like people's tastes, but their poor vision and splashing of the beach can lead to sharks confusing you for what they want to eat. This is what you should do if you see fins sliced through the water and the theme from the jaws begins to play. This is part of Lifehacker's wildlife attack series, as we humans think we are bears, snakes, wolves, sharks and even bees can turn fun days outdoors into intense and potentially life-threatening reality checks. Here's what to do when you find yourself confronted by a dead beast in a great outdoors. If you don't want to see fins circling while you surf, you should stick to safer waters. According to shark expert Richard Pierce, former chairman of the Shark Trust, it is best to avoid swimming near estuaries and fishing boats, Peirce said, carrying out fishing of all sizes as attracting sharks as important as fish caught bleeding in the water and attracting sharks. Even small fishing boats fry dead fish and fish fragments or chums into the water. It is also a bad idea to let yourself bleed or urinate in the water for the same reason. And if you can avoid swimming in the ocean in the morning or late at night, Peirce said, most shark attacks occur at that time because they reduce visibility and can crash people for prey. There are 19 shark attacks a year in the United States on average - the majority occur in Florida, with only one death occurring about every two years (five deaths per year worldwide). So while shark attacks are not everyday events, they are often enough that people who spend a lot of time in the ocean are always looking for a way to get them out. Read more how to keep sharks at Bay Sharrk repellent is a liquid extract made from still putrefied sharks that you spray in the water when you believe there are sharks nearby The idea is that nearby sharks smell dead friends and decide they don't want to eat you It works quite well, even Mythbusters say so, but these sprays are expensive and make the water around you smell like dead sharks, so it's not suitable for a fun day at the beach. Other methods, such as shark shields, use electromagnetic fields to keep sharks away. When sharks find these fields, electrical receptors make them feel severe discomfort, so they leave the area unharmed. Again, these have proven quite effective, but they cost up to $800 and are used only by deep sea divers or commercial fishermen. Telling the truth, humans do more harm to sharks than they do to us since we hunt them to make soups, lubricants and leather. Photo: Elias LevySo You've met sharkBut if you're running into one of the most powerful killing machines in the world. According to Peirce, splashing around savagely is just adrenaline sharks and making it more interesting. It doesn't want to eat you, but it might be curious. Unfortunately for you, the only way a shark can interact with things is with their razor-full mouth, so splashing like crazy can cause you to bite. When you revive your songwriting, here's what Peirce says you can do: facing a shark and keeping an eye on it. If you can bring it back to do something like a reef, do so. Sharks are ambushed predators and may lose interest if you show that you are aware of its presence. Curl up as a ball if it looks like it's going to pass. This makes you look smaller and less like something that can compete with sharks for food in the area. If it makes a bee for you, though, make yourself look as big as possible. Gently try to swim backwards towards the shore. If a shark attacks, George H. Burgess, director of the Florida Project for Shark Research, advises you to try and put something between you and the shark, if you can. As it makes way through, you try to hit sharks wherever you can. If a shark bites you and will not let it go, provoke the shark hard in the eyes or gums, as it is very sensitive. As soon as it allows you to go to the shore as soon as possible and seek medical attention. This article was originally published in August 2016, it was updated in September 2020 to meet lifehacker Style Guidelines Tomas Kotouc/Shutterstock,Just, in case you find yourself in the middle of Sharknado or just in the open waters on a beach holiday, you need to know how to survive a shark attack (find out everything you don't know about shark attacks). George Burgess The director of the Florida Project for Shark Research keeps a database of shark attacks from all over the world. The shark attack guru explains that there are three scenarios where you may need to know how to avoid shark attacks: first you are in the water when you see a shark. Secondly, sharks definitely come after you; and thirdly, you find yourself in the mouth of a shark (of course you'll be happy that you read this if number three used to be the case!) leaving WaterAccording to Burgess the first thing you should try to do is leave the water elegant. Failing that, Burgess advises positioning himself in a competent position to give the Sharks less access to you. Divers can try hiding in rocks or coral reefs or returning with their partner to give you an all-eye. As a swimmer, your options are more limited. Provoke it hard and fast, you really want to discourage sharks from biting you, Burgess. By the way, the nose is poked. Poking a shark on the nose is your best bet, since the nose is particularly sensitive, Burgess prefers the technique of performing bullying in the neighborhood before bully can punch you to give yourself an element of surprise. Since the nose is located above the shark's mouth, use an unactive object, it's good to have a spear or a knife, but if you're not useful in your swimsuit, even a swimming fin will do it. The point is to use something other than your own body so that the shark can not bite your hand. Can't reach its nose? As well as bullying situations in the neighborhood, Burgess warns that sharks tend to recover quickly, so you should leave as fast as you can when you move. Popping up on the nose works only once or twice before the wild animal can figure it out. This is the sea creature we want to meet. If All Else Fail, if you find yourself in the mouth of a shark, fight as hard as you can. Do this by committing to piercing the eyes and gums (five grooves on the side of the head), but hitting anything you can to keep the shark releasing you from life and death situations. Either way, when faced with a shark, you don't want to be passive. You want to indicate to sharks that you're big and strong, Burgess, don't miss a way to survive everything. Great white sharks are involved in the coldest attacks against humans. In 1985, Australia's Shirley Anderson was torn in two and then eaten by a great white shark. Rodney Fox had his lungs and stomach ripped open and needed more than 360 stitches in the 1963 attack [Source: Rodney Fox] in 2008 Dave Martin was killed in California when a good white bit left his leg. As of May 2020, great whites placed 326 unprotected attacks resulting in 52 deaths, 12 tiger sharks (129 unprotected attacks and 34 deaths) and third-ranked Shark bulls (116 unprotected attacks and 25 deaths). Why is the number so high? One factor to note is that great whites can be easily remembered, especially if they leave a tooth or two in the bait. This means that more attacks are attributed to them specifically than other less identifiable species [Source: Carey]. There may also be a series of ideas that great white sharks are guilty of shark attacks until proven innocent. Whether this bias is fair or not, scientists will quickly remind us that the odds of being attacked by sharks are not. Very small. Is humans particularly delicious with great white sharks? Probably not, according to scientists who have studied the stomach content of these sharks. Humans, because of their muscular content, are not very good foods for great whites who crave blurred fat. Many shark attack victims live. Tell their story because the shark bites as if it tasted it. While this will be a small comfort for anyone who's ever been stuck in the mouth of a shark, it may be a case of mistaken identity. Think about people lying on surfboards, their arms and legs out to the side to paddle and kick. From below, this shape may resemble a seal. The great white is undoubtedly dangerous, but if you try to decide whether to swim or not, it may be worth remembering that the elephant is more serious than the great whites. [Source: Carey] a common adage in the shark world now is that humans are more dangerous to sharks than sharks ever have. These sharks are hunted for sports and for their parts, including their teeth and fins. But what is the great great white shark hunt, if not humans? Find Next
